And my dear friend, I have been thinking of you very much lately, and of the many things you have done for me, and of the many things you have done for the world. I have been thinking of you very much lately, and of the many things you have done for me, and of the many things you have done for the world.

A

Although it is generally agreed that population declined in late medieval England, the causes of that decline are not easily established. Recurrent epidemics of plague took their toll after the great outbreak of 1345-9; other significant years for the disease were: 1361, 1369, 1375, 1390-1, 1405-7, 1439, 1478-9, 1499-1500. Professor Thrupp has shown how markedly male inter-generational replacement rates dropped in the later fourteenth century. At Thorney, a manor in the Bacon Collection, well over half the deaths between 1414 and 1422 show families childless or without male heirs. Brandon, however, showed more resilience, with a male replacement rate of unity or more between 1390 and 1430.

The difficult questions concerning age at marriage, incidence of marriage, and life expectancy require further investigation before it can be stated conclusively that increases in the death rate caused the European population decline in this period. Many suggestive court roll entries survive but their statistical relevance is without a firm base. For example, death entries in a Redgrave court roll for 1387 might suggest that a higher incidence of male infant mortality or mortality in general was causing population to decline. In the case of the death of John Smyth of Fenstretre, his niece Agnes, wife of John Crane, is the nearest heir, while when Roger atte Style dies, his only heir is Cristina, his daughter.
