The solutions to many medieval demographic problems depend upon determining the age of individuals who appear in the manorial court proceedings. Unfortunately, it is frequently impossible to obtain such data, although detailed entries occasionally appear. Two such entries occur on the Redgrave court proceedings for 1388:

A Adam Crane qui calumpnatus est natus domini venit in curia et fecit domino fidelitatem servilem qui quidem Adam habet duos filios videlicet Johannem etatis xxx annorum, Robertus etatis xxij annorum et tres filias videlicet Johannam etatis xv annorum Aliciam et Agnes etatis v annorum et amplius et manent cum patre eorum

B Johannes Tesses qui calumpnatur ut natus domini venit in curia et fecit domino fidelitatem Et predictus Johannes Tesses habet unum filium nomine Johannem etatis xij annorum et quinque filias videlicet Aliciam etatis xiiij annorum, Beatrice etatis viij annorum, Christinam etatis vj annorum, Marionam etatis iiij annorum et Johannam etatis ij annorum et manent cum patre eorum

In the latter decades of the fourteenth century, more villagers on the manors of the Abbot of Bury St. Edmunds began to leave their native homes. An ever-increasing number of illegal emigrants are named on the court rolls of the early fifteenth century. However, this data must be viewed with caution, for mobility may have been a common characteristic of village life as early as the thirteenth century. In order to fill his rent rolls and assure his income in a labor-deficient manorial or village economy, the lord would wish to restrain the activities of peripatetic peasants. Therefore it might be suspected that the documentary evidence only reflects a response to these changes as they affected the lord.

In theory, the serf belonged to his lord and could not move without the latter's permission. This permission could be obtained by payment of a sum called "chevage" (chevagium), which allowed the individual concerned to be away, usually for a year--permission being obtained again the next year and so on. In 1388 Adam Tesses paid the lord two hens for permission to leave the manor for one year.

Adam Tesses, the lord's customary tenant, gives the lord a fine for license to reside outside the lord's homage until the feast of St. Michael next, by pledge of William Clark and John Tesses who pledge to have the same (Adam) at the same court and that he should not stay away any longer under penalty of 100 s. and he makes an oath of faith and service.

Here the lord's concern to discourage illegal departure is reflected in the use of pledges and a penalty of five pounds, a hefty sum, if Adam fails to return.
