Libby's Foods and Where They Come From

LIBBY, McNEILL & LIBBY has established kitchens and prepares its different foods at the very source of supply. Libby has always followed the principle that foods must be placed in the cans in the freshest possible state, and it has firmly adhered to this rule ever since the days when its founders began packing cooked corned beef in Chicago, more than half a century ago.

Today, with canning kitchens distributed from Alaska to Southern California, and from Hawaii to the Atlantic seaboard, the same policy is maintained with every

Arrows on the map point to the spot where each variety of food is canned. In some instances the same variety is packed at several different points. The locations have been carefully selected, so that only the best foods are packed under the Libby label.

Libby's Foods are expertly selected and prepared by men carefully trained in Libby methods and governed by the uniform standard of Libby quality.

Distribution of Libby's 100 Foods

To facilitate the distribution of Libby's Foods in the United States and Canada, Libby has divided these countries into zones or territories. Each one is in charge of a Libby branch house. These branch houses are situated at points where shipping costs are lowest and where shipping service is the best.

Carload lots of Libby's Foods are sent to them from the Libby canneries. Then, in turn, they are ordered out in smaller shipments to customers in the surrounding territory.

When practicable, a carload of Libby's Foods is shipped direct to the customer from the cannery. Frequently, to lessen shipping costs, a number of customers pool their orders together and make up a carload, known as a pool car.

The first export shipment of Libby's Corned Beef was made in February, 1876. This early trade was handled by export firms, which were located in cities on the coast. Their business was to handle the shipping of goods from one country to another. The early firms handling this business were located in New York and San Francisco.

As the export volume grew, it became necessary to have centers for food distribution in distant parts of the world. These agencies have grown until today we have the list as given below.

In Libby's five major lines—namely, canned meats, fruits and vegetables, salmon, milk, and pickles and condiments—there are over 100 different foods, only a very few of which are not sold in foreign markets.

As a part of its foreign merchandising program, Libby's advertising has appeared in many countries and in many languages. These include French, German, Norwegian, Spanish, Chinese, and Japanese.
