

In the early days of this country, people were concerned chiefly about building plans. Landscape architecture was known only by name to a majority of home-makers. Today, there is no lack of attention to the development of the grounds. Each year finds the garden del-egated to a broader field of service, and with this renewed interest has come an increased demand for marble. Not only have the large estates used marble for swimming pools, fountains, shelter houses and bridges, but the owners of smaller homes, also, have enriched their grounds through the judicious placing of sun dials, bird baths, gazing globes, seats and vases. Discriminating buyers have Marble was introduced into the gar-dens many centuries ago. The home-builders of the Old World gave almost as much thought to the garden as to the house itself. Nor was any element al-lowed to enter it which might detract from its dignity and refinement. Marble was admitted because it is never obtru-sive or unduly conspicuous. It takes its place naturally in the most delicate of settings. It is just as much a part of na-ture as the shrubs or greensward, yet, it is none the less rich in individuality and distinctiveness. Above all, it provides life and light for the garden when the flow-ers are dormant and the trees somberly dressed.

turned to marble because, like the build-ers of the Old World, they were im-pressed by its loveliness and by its un-questioned adaptability to a natural setting.

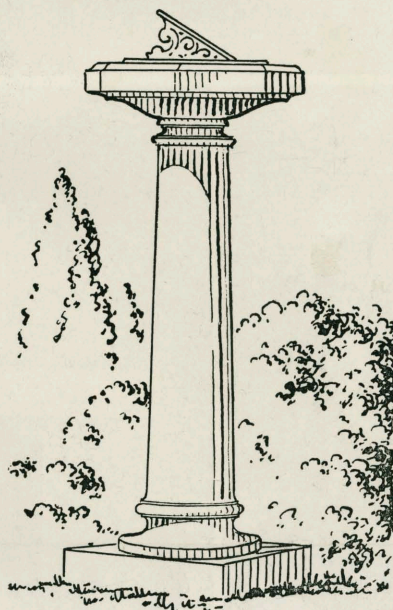

It is but natural that the quarries of Vermont should take a leading part in providing the marble for the nation's garden work. They are the oldest marble quarries in the United States, and the output is of proven durability. Slabs ex-posed for 160 years have come through the New England weather in excellent condition. And with the guaranty of permanence, Vermont Marble is unex-celled in beauty and in the variety of its colors and veining.

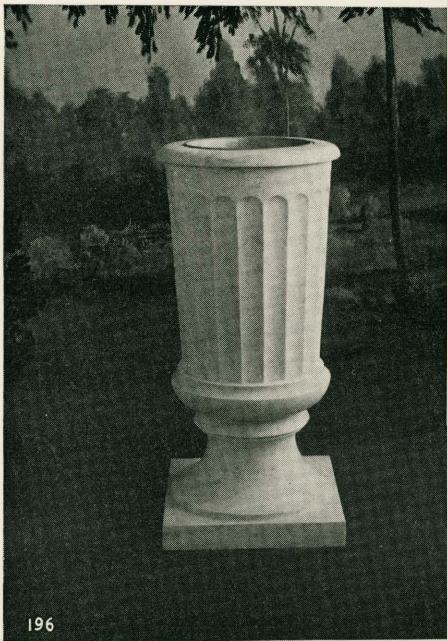

Within this folder are illustrated a few of the modern designs in Vermont mar-ble garden furniture. The pictures are small, but they at least will serve as sug-gestions. If you are interested, either in them or in some other form of garden work, we shall be glad to give you addi-tional facts and figures.

VERMONT MARBLE COMPANY
PROCTOR, VERMONT

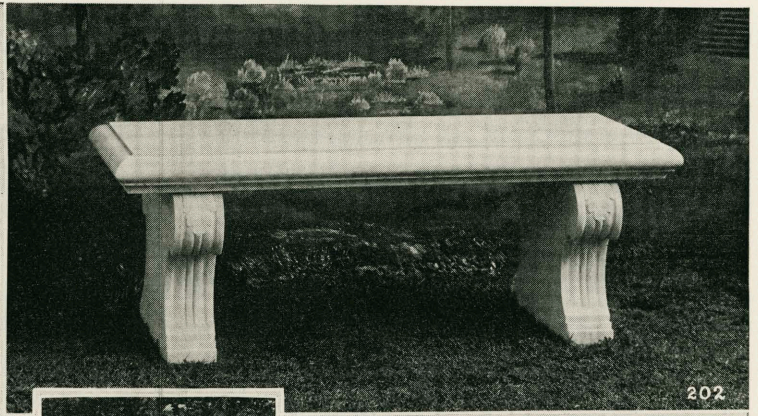

Sentinels²⁵⁷ of the Season

"Brightness and beauty are always in season when marble comes into the garden."

196

202

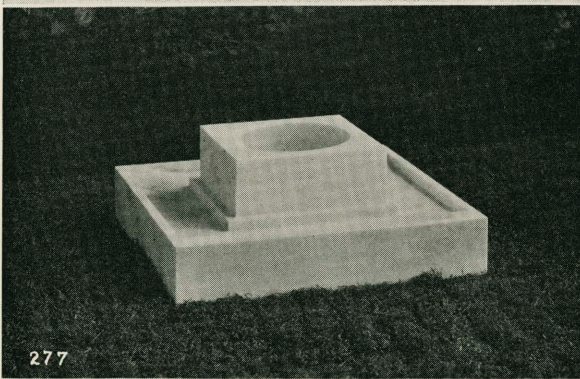

6028

270

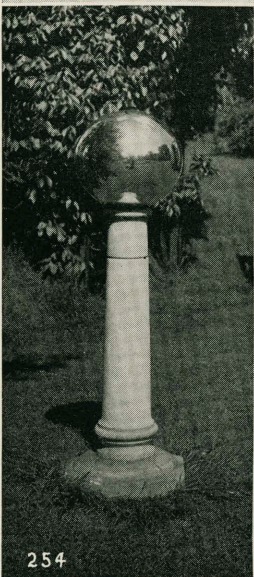

268

277

269

254

280

255